Peacebridges or Peacewalls?

Duncan Morrow reflects on the recent events in East Belfast

Peacewall in East Belfast

Last week provided a striking contrast in symbolism in our long march from hatred. In the City still divided by its name, young people walked among each other from both banks of the Foyle to open the ‘peace bridge’ in a spectacular triumph of hope over experience. This sat poignantly against the backdrop of hooded men, gunshots and community marshals in East Belfast. Here talk was of paramilitaries, higher walls and of a comeback for guns and helicopters.

So which is it to be- peace bridges or peace walls? And what is the message to be- meet and mix or attack and destroy?

Without doubt the loyalist mobs who descended on the Short Strand last Monday drew on the hopelessness of many in Inner East Belfast, exhausted by years of abandonment and decay. And of course, on every side there are stories of ongoing incidents on the interface going back months which make it easily plausible that the latest attacks were an answer to relentless provocation from the other side. For those forced to live with the chronic reality of ‘low level’ violence of the interfaces, it will always seem like ‘they’ started it.

Peacebridges or Peacewalls? (contd)

But the same is true of every peacewall or barrier in Belfast. After more than 40 years, it is time to recognise that higher fences do not make good neighbours- they make long term enemies. Peacewalls are a magnet for every form of sectarian anti-social behaviour and an excuse for the next generation of bored teenagers to fire ball bearings and stones across walls at anonymous but enemy neighbours without the slightest twinge of conscience about the broken windows or damaged cars or petrified parents and pensioners on the other side. At best peace walls contain violence; they also make enemies visible and attract all those with an interest in exploiting the opportunity.

This seems to be what happened last week: deep unhappiness and alienation within loyalist East Belfast got attention when it turned into an attack on Catholic homes in the Short Strand. When it is about them and us, we can all take sides and sectarian patterns lead to easy assumptions.

But what if it was different this time? What if any attack on anyone's home was a criminal attack on all? What if rioting teenagers incited by their elders were a scandal of child protection? What if despair in one community was not a 'reason' to attack the homes of others? What if anyone using violence was seen to be destroying the life chances of the very people they claim to protect- those living in poor communities on either side of peacewalls?

Some of what has to happen is short term: continuing to stand by the many people and projects building bridges in the most difficult places. But it will need more than political gestures, community pilots and European peace bridges. If we are to underpin hope we have to do two things: We have to build an economy which can create jobs and relieve poverty in inner East Belfast and across many areas of Northern Ireland and we have to remorselessly tackle the hatred and enmity which prevent investment, scare off tourists and shift Rory McIlroy off the front page by threatening mayhem. Unfortunately, this is nothing less than sea change in the understanding of how community relations policy relates to economics and social deprivation. Instead of seeing them as opposites, it is imperative that we see them as vital partners.

This week, after years of promises the OFMDFM Committee is finally scheduled to receive feedback from the public on the review of Community Relations. The fundamental criticism of the consultation document was that it was inadequate to the scale of the task in hand. What interfaces need is a serious plan for a better future which will render them unnecessary within a measurable time scale.

When asked by researchers if they want walls removed, most residents near peacelines still say 'not yet'. But if asked whether they wish the same future for their children, everyone answers with an unambiguous 'no'. It is up to all of us to start providing plausible answers and not just wringing our hands every time some faction or group decides to exploit the interface for short term political gain.

Interface Conference

Report by Grace Hamilton, CRC

There was an immense deal of frustration voiced at an emergency meeting of Interface Community Groups called by the CRC, following the high profiled riots in East Belfast, last month. Over ninety community representatives from across the political and religious divide in Belfast and representatives from key statutory agencies were in attendance at the meeting held in The Spires Conference Centre on 23 June 2011. There was unanimous condemnation of the violence and an overwhelming consensus that within the community there was dissatisfaction at the lack of political leadership in the PUL community and a political plan for the way forward.

“There is no real confidence that there is a political direction and there is no positive environment in which we can address the issues.”

“Government representation for the loyalist working-class people is non-existent, there is no-one speaking for us and there is no voice for the East Belfast working class people.”

“There is a sense of disjointedness - no one is listening to the community, and these issues have been around for a while.”

While the rioting had come as a shock to many people within not only Northern Ireland but Belfast, this was not the case in terms of the community in East Belfast, who reported that there has been a consistent build-up of such trouble. Hope was expressed that the long-awaited Programme for Cohesion Sharing and Integration (CSI) would offer support to address the legacy of the past and build a shared and reconciled society. There was a message to the Executive to agree resource and roll out the CSI Programme as soon as possible to assist in peace building initiatives.

Young people, it was felt, should be at the core of any peace building initiatives and seen as a source of positive change, not as a problem. It was highlighted that in relation to the riots; “Young people have been brought into a power struggle that has been motivated by adults.”

Another attendee commented:

“This is the time to engage young people. There is an opportunity now when young people want to move away from the past but the danger is that in the absence of leadership this will fall back into entrenched roles - and that young people won't take that tentative step forward in the first place.”

It was acknowledged that there was a need for the media to take responsibility for such events, having adhered to the philosophy that ‘bad news sells’. Numerous references were made to a large number of positive projects ongoing in East Belfast and other Interface areas which are ignored by the media, despite calls for these to be publicised.

Duncan Morrow, CEO of CRC advised that the CRC undertook to raise the key issues from the meeting at the forthcoming OFMDFM led North Belfast Ministerial Working Group meeting and the CRC led Interface Working Group. CRC agreed to track progress and keep the sector informed. Furthermore, groups were advised that CRC would assist in any facilitation role that may be required.

Summer Interface Programmes

The Community Relations Council has had a long established role in supporting a wide range of initiatives aimed at reducing community tensions and promoting dialogue in interface communities during the summer months. The Council's CR/CD Grants Scheme aims to support groups in a number of specific areas during the summer period.

Diversionsary Programmes

When tensions in communities are particularly high support is available for activities which provide alternatives for young people who are at risk of becoming involved in interface conflict. These types of activities vary a great deal from taking young people out of the area for outdoor activities to providing programmes in local community venues.

Whilst diversionsary programmes only offer short term solutions to an immediate problem they can nevertheless be particularly helpful during traditional times of tension or when community conflict has arisen unexpectedly and an immediate response is needed.

Summer Programmes

The CR/CD Scheme is happy to consider applications for summer activities that may take place over a number of weeks or on a residential basis although there are some important points to note. Any funding proposal would need to clearly demonstrate a commitment to promoting good relations which must be evidenced through programmes activities. These activities can be trips to places of significant historical interest, facilitated CR workshops, creative media projects which give participants the opportunity to reflect on their daily experiences of other communities, or projects which involve the active participation of other young people from differing communities. It should be noted that whilst we accept the important role and place that recently settled communities have in Northern Ireland it is important that programmes seek to include communities from which participants may be in most conflict with. The grants scheme will be prioritising those applications that are seeking practical ways in which they will promote relationships between differing communities. Whilst the grant scheme will consider one-off events applicants should demonstrate how they plan to integrate their summer activities into longer term programme work

CRC Team

The CR/CD Grants Scheme is administered by the Council's Funding and Development Programme. Should you wish to discuss a proposal please do not hesitate to contact any member of the Funding and Development Programmes CR/CD Team who will be happy to discuss your proposals before submission and offer any assistance they can with project development. Please note that this is one of the busiest times of the year for the programme therefore it is vital that applications are received as early as possible in order for applications to be processed before your project takes place.

OFMDFM Committee told CSI Strategy will be a Litmus test for Society

Bebhinn McKinley, CRC Policy Officer

In a meeting at Parliament Buildings on 22 June the Community Relations Council briefed the OFMDFM committee on CRC's response to the Cohesion, Sharing and Integration Strategy.

Briefing the Committee Duncan Morrow, Jacqueline Irwin and CRC Chair Tony McCusker welcomed the positive recognition given by Office of the First and Deputy First Minister in the 6th June Assembly oral questions sessions of the valuable contribution of community relations work and the pivotal role of CRC. As part of the response First Minister Peter Robinson remarked that "community relations week serves as a reminder of the good work of countless community groups, volunteers and public bodies who are committed to tackling the problems of division in our communities. It gives fresh impetus to the determination that most of us share to eradicate the divisions and hatreds that prevent so many from enjoying the benefits of the peaceful, prosperous and fair society that we are continuing to build." He also noted that in regards to building a shared future "Community Relations Council had played a pivotal role"

In relation to the renewed impetus on bringing forward the Cohesion, Sharing and Integration Strategy it was put to the committee that CRC and those engaged in community relations and peace building and other areas strongly welcomed the renewed focus to develop a robust CSI strategy and action plan and would look forward to the opportunity to formally input into it as it is finalised.

However CRC also highlighted that there is a need to ensure that a robust CSI strategy and action plan is considered as not only having benefits in terms of better community relationships but in doing so can contribute immensely to addressing inequalities, poverty, disadvantage, under performance, trade and investment, economics, health and wellbeing, housing, tourism and the legacy of conflict.

It was also raised that a fit for purpose CSI strategy should be seen as an opportunity to address the challenges of segregation and division that continue to impact on our society physically, socially, and economically and that there is an onus on society and the executive to ensure that this opportunity is not squandered for this and future generations. In essence it must be considered as a core litmus test for how we want to go forward as society.

OFMDFM Committee told CSI Strategy will be a Litmus test for Society (contd)

CRC also highlighted to the committee members that

- There is a need for the revised CSI Strategy and action plan to have a clear vision, purpose and associated aims and objectives which have specific goals and targets.
- There is a need for actions to be required of all Government Departments and relevant public bodies in contributing to the finalised Strategy. It is imperative that this is not viewed as solely an OFMDFM matter but as Executive and Assembly wide.
- If we are serious about addressing poverty and disadvantage we must recognise that on the whole those who have and continue to be impacted to the greatest degree by the conflict are those who are living in areas where there is high level poverty and disadvantage.

In concluding CRC also recognised that the representation of OFMDFM through Junior Minister Bell's attendance and speech at CRC's Policy Conference was extremely valuable in demonstrating both the Department's and Executive's commitment to the necessary community relations and that feedback from this by delegates was that it sent a positive message to those involved in this area of work and in recognising the hard work of all those to support our society in conflict transformation.

CRC currently have a CSI tracker which monitors any information emerging in regards to CSI which can be viewed on our website. We will also be forwarding the link to the official Hansard record of the briefing when it becomes available.

PeacePlayers International

Last month PeacePlayers International-Northern Ireland (PPI-NI), a Belfast-based peace-building organization that uses sport to bridge divides between Catholic and Protestant children, hosted a series of three “Super Twinning” cross-community basketball tournaments.

The “Super Twinning” represent a celebratory conclusion to PPI-NI’s primary school Twinning Programme, a cross-community intervention that pairs one Catholic primary school and one Protestant primary school for sport and community relations activities during the school day over the course of the academic year.

The Super Twinning were designed to bring two Primary 6 Twinning Programmes together, four schools in total, to create a sense of unity and pride among twinning partners, as well as to provide the early foundation for future integrated basketball clubs in interface communities. Over the course of three days, the three “Super Twinning” engaged approximately 240 children from 12 Catholic and Protestant primary schools from North, West and East Belfast to play together.

Trevor Ringland, Chair of PPI-NI, said, “these events fully embody the basic premise on which PeacePlayers was founded - that children who play together can learn to live together. These types of events provide a real opportunity for the young participants to bond further as teammates in a fun, safe and competitive environment.” He went on to say, “It is really nice to be able to share such a positive story which stands in stark contrast to the unfortunate and divisive headlines that have dominated the news in recent days.”

Gareth Harper, Managing Director of PPI-NI, said, “significant credit must be given to all of the primary schools involved; Holy Cross Girls and Wheatfield; Our Lady’s and Victoria Park; St. Matthew’s and Avoniel; Edenbrooke and Bunscoil Bheann Mhadagain; Holy Cross Boys and Glengormley Integrated; and St. Clare’s and Carr’s Glen. These events went ahead as scheduled, with the full support of the schools, against the backdrop of the awful violence of the last few nights.”

On the 6th of July in a partnership between Ulster Rugby, the Gaelic Athletic Association, the Irish Football Association and PeacePlayers International - Northern Ireland, PPI-NI will be inviting all of PeacePlayers International’s P7 and P6 programme participants from North Belfast to participate in the Game of Three Halves. This initiative incorporates three of the most popular sports in Northern Ireland (rugby, football, and Gaelic football) and aims to promote respect for diversity in a fun, safe environment, as well as highlight the benefits of exercise and a healthy, active lifestyle.

PeacePlayers coaches will lead cross-community teams to participate in all three sports, as well as team-building activities aimed at developing positive relationships. As an added bonus, well-known local sporting stars will also make an appearance at the event, which will take place at Ballysillan leisure centre on Wednesday 6th July from 10:00am - 3:00pm. Rural Respect Week

The recent Community Relations Week ran parallel with the Rural Respect Week organised by the Rural Community Network with many of the events fitting neatly into the CR Week programme.

Rural Community Network's peace-building programme, the Rural Enabler programme welcomed the opportunity to showcase community and good relations work across Northern Ireland and the border counties of Ireland. This PEACE III funded programme supports rural communities to tackle the fears associated with reconciliation and antiracism work, through a community development approach and emerged from a research and seminar process developed collaboratively by the Community Relations Council and Rural Community Network.

Michael Hughes, RCN Chief Executive Officer said, "The Rural Community Network is delighted to support Community Relations Week through a range of activities to demonstrate the effectiveness of peace-building in rural communities. The Enabler programme supports rural groups and individuals, who are the experts in their communities, to build begin the often difficult task of building positive relationships".

Rural Respect Week, in partnership with Unite against Hate and in collaboration with CRC, was an opportunity to highlight the work of those who are taking risks in developing positive relationships to showcase their approaches, and resulted in 19 events with 1,658 participants! The range of events allowed all ages, from all backgrounds, to take a step in recognising that diversity is the one thing we have in common and should be welcomed, rather than feared. Primary schools, drama groups, churches and minority ethnic support groups, to name a few, embraced the opportunity to build bridges in their communities by inviting guests to explore and share their common humanity. From Antrim to Sligo groups, including the Irish Wheelchair Association, African Caribbean Forum and Women Making Waves, demonstrated the effectiveness of dialogue and understanding in building relationships.

The Regional Coordinator of the programme, Ali McAllister said, "Reconciliation and anti-racism work is never without difficulty but this event demonstrated the commitment and willingness of people from very different backgrounds to come together and celebrate their diversity".

Shared public space still marked by too many tatty flags

A report from Queen's University Belfast has found that a large number of flags are still left flying on lampposts on main roads in Northern Ireland at the end of the summer months. The latest report Public Displays of Flags and Emblems in Northern Ireland: Survey 2010 published by the Institute of Irish Studies at Queen's, reveals that 3,876 flags were put up along main roads in July 2010. The research, which is funded by the Office of the First and Deputy First Minister, surveyed political symbolism on all arterial routes and town centres in Northern Ireland during the first two weeks in July and last two weeks of September over a five-year period from 2006 to 2010. In addition researchers conducted surveys two weeks after Easter in 2008, 2009 and 2010. In each of the surveys, researchers counted and mapped the different types of flags and other emblems on display.

The vast majority of the flags put up in the summer months are unionist in nature. In September 2010 1,098 unionist flags remained flying on lampposts whilst 757 were nationalist - the vast majority of these were GAA flags. In 2010 there was a slight increase in the display of paramilitary flags in July although since 2006 there has been a decrease from 161 to 102.

Dr Dominic Bryan, Director at the Institute of Irish Studies, said: "We know from questions asked in the Northern Ireland Life and Times Survey that displays of flags detrimentally effect people's use of facilities and shops in certain areas. While expressions of political identity at times of festival and commemoration are common all over the world, there is no doubt that displays in Northern Ireland are left to demarcate territorial space.

"This issue remains a crucial one in developing a shared and equal society. It appears that overall policies developed to create more shared public space by reducing the length of time flags are flown have not been successful. Perhaps one thing that could be emphasised in the future is to treat symbols with respect and not leave flags to go tatty and dirty over the winter months."

Every few weeks, the programme holds festival nights, which brings all the participants from each area together in a neutral venue, to play matches in the same format among each other. This enables the groups to engage with each other and again build relationships through sport. The programme included a series of workshops, providing participants with information and awareness of issues relevant to this age group – Drugs awareness, Sectarianism, Good Relations and respect, Alcohol Abuse, Mental Health and Suicide Awareness.

IRISH PEACE CENTRES INTERNATIONAL SUMMER SCHOOL AUGUST 2011 – CAPTURING AND SHARING THE LEARNING

Irish Peace Centres – a consortium of four peace-building organisations - works to become a centre of excellence in sharing and learning experiences. Through a unique consortium approach to peace-building, the Irish Peace Centres has created a strategic cross-border structure that supports a network of people who have become engaged in cultivating positive relations at a local level. The consortium, which comprises Co-operation Ireland, the Corrymeela Community and the Glencree Centre for Peace and Reconciliation, is now well established and working effectively. To mark the end of the first phase of Peace III funding, the consortium is hosting an International Summer School from 1st - 4th August at Corrymeela Centre, Ballycastle. The four-day residential event will engage our colleagues from practitioners and academics, to the groups and individuals with whom we work, as a way of sharing and exploring the learning that has been captured at a local and international level.

The Summer School will be a celebration of thinking, talking and acting for peace where delegates are invited to challenge the consortium and inform us so that the models and programmes for peace-building that are borne out of this dialogue will be both focused and relevant. A carefully selected range of speakers will set the tone for each day and contribute an important perspective that will fuel discussion and debate which will be carried throughout the course of the Summer School.

Irish Peace Centres' Co-ordinators will model the programmes which they have been delivering and share their understanding of the perceptions and impact that each programme has achieved. The programmes showcased at the event will capture the thematic areas of the consortium's work: women and peace-building; ex-combatants, survivors, wider society and storytelling; theology and peace; interpersonal relationships and well-being. The programme of activities aims to be inclusive and co-operative where delegates will have an active and informative role; it will be an opportunity to understand peace-building and reconciliation work through an integrated approach.

In-keeping with the creative and organic approach to activities developed and delivered by Irish Peace Centres, the occasion will be captured through creative and artistic expressions by in-house artists. It is hoped that the event will mark a critical juncture in Irish Peace Centre's learning and design of peace-building programmes for the future.
